Creative Thinking

Creative thinking involves the same mental processes that are utilized in other forms of thinking, i.e., experience, association, and expression. Mental impressions are received, recalled, reflected upon, and applied. Out of this reaction process often arise creative expression and appreciation. The stages of creative thinking usually include preparation, a time of incubation, and insight.

A long period of preparatory activity is needed. During this time, materials may be assembled and integrated, or the various aspects of the problem investigated. It is sometimes possible for a person to create on the spur of the moment. This person must have sufficient insight, experience, energy, and persistence to create it. During the period of preparation, whether long or short, ideas continue to be formed. Information that is acquired for immediate application has greater creative value than information that is acquired today for use in distant future.

After the initial stage of preparation, there follows a period during which possible vague aspects of creative impression are taking form. This is the period of incubation and is followed by illumination which may come with amazing suddenness. As a result of this continued thought processes, the individual suddenly becomes aware of relationships that earlier he had not recognized.

Inspirations come to us as we think and reflect. A most interesting collection could be compelled if each time we experienced one of these flashes we were to jot it down. Some of them might have future value. Some individuals have good ideas but lack facility in expressing them. It is the school's function, then, to help learners not only to gain ideas but also to express them in understandable language.

Two characteristics identify creative thinking: (1) original outcome, and (2) irregular and unpredictable thinking procedure. Goals and procedures differ. Creative thinking involves the process of identification. Creativity implies the production of a totality or partially novel identity. The new identification emerges as known identities are mentally rearranged to form associations that are related to the desired goal.

Word Study:

Give the meaning of the following words:

Association	Impressions
Appreciation	Incubation
Insight	Assembled
Spur of the moment	Persistence

Grammar Study and Practice:

Kinds of the Sentence:

When we write or speak, we use words to express our thoughts. A group of words expressing a complete thought is called a sentence. If we express a complete thought about the Nile, we say:

a) The Nile is a river.

b) The Nile flows through Egypt.

c) The Nile supplies the Egyptian farmers with water.

Each of these sentences makes one complete statement about the Nile.

A sentence of this kind is called a simple sentence.

We may, however, join two or more sentences in different ways, we may say:

d)The Nile is a river and flows through Egypt.

e)The river Nile which flows through Egypt, supplies the farmer with water.

In sentence(d) we have two statements of equal importance. It is a compound sentence. In sentence (e) we have two sentences, but one is more important than the other. The principal statement is “ the river Nile supplies the farmer with water.” The statement “which flows through Egypt” is connected and depends on “ the Nile” the sentence (e) is used to be a complex sentence. A sentence, therefor, may be simple, compound, or complex. A simple sentence consists of one complete statement. A compound sentence consists of two or more complete statements, all of equal importance.

A complex sentence consists of one principal statement and one or more dependent or subordinate statements called clauses.

The simple sentence –subject and predicate:

(a) The Nile is a river.

(b) The Nile flows through Egypt.

(c) The Nile supplies the farmer with water.

Each of these sentences says something about the “Nile” The word” the “Nile” forms what we call the subject of the sentence.

The part of the sentence which says something about the subject is called the predicate. The predicate of the sentence (a) tells us what the subject is. The predicates of the sentence (b) and (c), tell us what the subject does. Every sentence can be divided into two parts:

1-Subject	2-Predicate
The Nile	is a river.
The Nile	flows through Egypt.
The Nile	supplies the Egyptian farmer with water.

Exercises:

Divide the following sentences into subjects and predicates:

- 1-The farmer works hard.
- 2-He ploughs the field.
- 3-Ali ran to the station.
- 4-We met him near the school.
- 5-The cows are grazing in the field.
- 6-A dog disturbed us last night.
- 7-A lazy boy never learns his lessons.
- 8-The old man was in great pain.
- 9-Animals in Egypt help the farmer in his work.
- 10-Being hungry, the poor boy asked for something to eat.
- 11-There is a bottle of ink on the table.
- 12-Aly gets up early every morning.

Writing Activities:

- Write a paragraph on “ Ways of Developing Creativity in our Children”

* Translate the following passage into Arabic:

The school has four functions sufficiently specific as compared with ordinary associations of life. First, a complex civilization is too complex to be assimilated as a whole. It has to be broken up into portions, and assimilated in pieces, in a gradual and graded way. The relationships of our present social life are so numerous and so interwoven that a child could not readily share in many of the most important of them. Not sharing in them, their meaning would not be communicated to him, would not become a part of his own mental disposition. The first job of the school is to provide a simplified environment. It selects the features which are fairly fundamental and capable of being responded to by the young. Then it establishes a progressive order, using the factors first acquired as a means of gaining insight into what is more complicated.

Good Moslem Manners

Among foods which the Moslems is allowed to eat, much depends on personal liking and disliking. Something which may be good (tayyib) as food for one man may be good and even useful, but their use might be disliked by others. It was because of their fact that the Prophet said that whoever ate onions and garlic, should not approach the mosque. The smell of onions and garlic would not be liked by others. However, there is no harm in taking them in a cooked form or in some other form in which there is no unpleasant smell. One may eat them on occasions when one is not likely to appear in public.

it is recommended that hands should be washed before the taking of food and after finishing it. When one begins a meal, he should do so after saying “Bismillah”. When he finishes eating he should give thanks to Allah or say “Alhamdu Li Llah”. The following form of thanks giving is often used: “All Praise is due to Allah who gave us sufficient to eat and drink”.

Hadith has mentioned that the man who gives thanks to Allah after taking a meal is compared to the man who fasts and is patient in doing so. It was the Holy Prophet’s practice to clean the mouth with water after taking food, so that no particle of food should be left in the mouth. There is also a direction that a man should eat with the right hand. It is prohibited to blow one’s breath on food or drink. it is also good manners in eating that a man should take only so much in his plate as not to leave anything on it after eating, and that he should take a piece from the food that lies near his hand.

It is related that the Prophet would never condemn the food which he was offered. If he liked it, he would eat of it. Feeding the hungry when one sits at a meal is regarded as good manners. Eating and drinking in vessels of silver and gold was prohibited. The reason is that silver and gold can be bought only by the rich and not the poor. This is against the democratic spirit of Islam.

“Modern Technology as a Mixed Blessing”

b)Translate the following Passage into Arabic:

Men usually want to have their own way. They want to think and act, as they like. No one, however, can have his own way all the time. A man can not live in society without considering the interests of others as well as his own interests. ‘Society’ means a group of people with the same laws and the same way of life. People in society may make their own decisions, but these decisions ought not to be unjust or harmful to others. For example a motorist may be in a hurry to get to a friend's house. He sets out driving at full speed like a competitor in a motor race. There are other vehicles and also pedestrians on the road. Suddenly there is a crash. Too many road accidents happen because of selfish drivers.

Imam Ahmad

The last of the four great imams was Ahmad Ibn Hanbal, who was born at Baghdad in the year 164 A.H. and died there in 241. He too made a very extensive study of Hadith, his famous work on the subject-the Musnad of Ahmad Ibn Hanbal-containing nearly thirty thousand Hadith. This monumental compilation, prepared by his son Abdu-llah, was based on the material collected by the Imam himself. In the Musnad, however, as already remarked, Hadith are not arranged according to subject matter, but under the name of the companion to whom a Hadith is ultimately traced. But though the Musnad of Ahmad contains a large number of Hadith, it does not apply those strict rules of criticism favored by men like Bukhari and Muslim. It was indeed only an arrangement according to subject matter that made a criticism of Hadith possible, and the Musnads, in which Hadith relating to the same matter were scattered throughout the book, could not devote much attention to the subject-matter, and were not even sufficiently strict in scrutinizing the line of transmission. Accordingly, the Musnad of Ahmad cannot claim the same reliability as regards its material as can the collections of the Muhadithin. From the very nature of his exertions, it is evident that Imam Ibn Hanbal made very little use of reasoning and as he depended almost entirely on Hadith, the result was that he admitted even the weakest Hadith. It would thus appear that from the system of Abu Hanifa, who applied reasoning very freely, and sought to deduce all questions from the Holy Qur'an by the help of reason, the system of Ahmad Ibn Hanbal is distinguished by the fact that it makes the least possible use of reason, and thus there was a marked falling off in the last of the four great Imams, so far as the application of reason to matters of religion is concerned. Even the system of Abou Hanifa himself deteriorated on account of the later jurists of that school not developing the high ideal of the master, with the consequence that the world of Islam gradually shut the door of Ijtihad upon itself.

“Appropriate Ways of Calling for Islam”

b) Translate the following passage into Arabic:

Early Arabic literature reflected the Arab life and presented the tribal wars, tribal virtues of courage, and generosity. A study of this history would convince a student of literature that the poetic art had long been perfected among the Arabs. This poetry was expressed in fine images, complex meter, and perfect rhyme.

Under the Ummayyad rulers, the Islamic state extended to the West to include the Arab Maghreb, and from there, the Arabs crossed the sea to establish a Muslim state in Spain. For the first time, Arabs and Europeans had direct contact with each other. Arabic poetry was then transmitted to Europe through Andalusia and Southern France. The Christians of Andalusia who became half-Arabicised were familiar with Arabic poetry and helped to communicate it to the Northern kingdom.

Islam as the Greatest Unifying Force

It is often said that religion is responsible for much of the hatred and bloodshed in the world, but a quick glance at the history of religion will show this to be a monstrous misconception. Love, concord, sympathy, kindness to the other fellow-men, have been the message of every religion, and every nation has learnt these essential lessons in their true purity only through the spirit of selflessness and service which a faith in Allah has inspired. If there have been selfishness, hatred and bloodshed, they have been there in spite of religion, not as a consequence of the message of love which religion has brought. They have been there because nature is subject to these things, and their presence only shows that a still greater religious awakening is required, that a true faith in Allah is yet a crying need of humanity. That men shall sometimes turn to low and unworthy things, does not show that the nobler sentiments are worthless, but only that their development has become a more urgent necessity.

If unification is the true basis of human civilization, by which phrase I mean the civilization not of one nation or of one country but of humanity as a whole, then Islam is undoubtedly the greatest civilizing force the world has ever known or is likely to know. fourteen hundred years ago it was Islam that saved it from crushing into an abyss of savagery; it came to the help of a civilization whose very foundations had collapsed, and set about laying a new foundation, a new culture, and new ethics. A new idea of the unity of the human race as a whole, not of the unity of this or that nation, was introduced into the world. An idea so mighty that it welded together nations which had warred with and hated each other since the world began. It was in Arabia that this great miracle , as an English writer terms it, was introduced, a miracle before the magnitude of which every thing dwindles into insignificance.

“The Importance of Studying English to Moslems”

b)Translate the following passage into Arabic:

With the establishment of the Arab regime and the spread of Islam in territories inhabited by civilized peoples such as those who had lived under the reign of Byzantine and Persian empires, cultural fertilization was inevitable. It was preceded, or at least accompanied by an internal movement for the verification and recording of the Arabic and Islamic heritages. The first step was taken when the text of the Quran was established in an authorized version. This was somewhat slowly followed by the writing down of the traditions of prophet Mohammed. Both necessitated the extension of the process of the Arabic language itself and its rich poetry, folklore and history.

Knowledge in Islam

In Islam education was a sacred aim many centuries before the West cared for it. Islam calls Moslems to acquire knowledge. This is clear in the Quran and the prophet's Tradition. God puts the learnt people in a higher position. "Allah" will exalt those who believe among you and those who have knowledge to higher ranks. "Allah" also says "Are those who have knowledge on an equality with those who have no knowledge. Besides, the first poem of the Quran revealed to Prophet Mohamed were about reading. "Allah" says to the Prophet: "read in the name of thy Lord, Who creates man from a clot, read and thy Lord is the most generous; Who teaches by the pen, teaches man which he knew not".

The Prophet Mohamed says about acquiring knowledge, "To acquire knowledge is a duty of every Moslem, male or female". "Seek knowledge even if you have to go to China to get it" The Prophet shows us the importance of the learnt people. He says: "The scholars are the inheritors of the Prophets. "He who leaves his home to seek knowledge , walks in the path of Allah".

Acquiring Knowledge helps man to live in progress and welfare. Islam calls for acquiring knowledge for the good of the humanity. Therefore the Islamic knowledge is closely related to life. In the great days of Islam, the mosque was the place for both worship and education. There was no difference between religious and worldly knowledge. Moslem scholars were interested in both religion and secular sciences such as medicine, mathematics, physics, astronomy, and geography. So the Moslems could achieve progress and build a strong and great Moslem nation.

The Moslems carried torches of knowledge and progress to many parts in Europe which was in its dark ages. Much of the knowledge, inventions, and discoveries achieved by the Moslem scientists were introduced into Europe. The Moslems established in some of the European countries, research centers, universities, and institutes. Thus Moslem knowledge and civilization were of the main bases on which the Renaissance in Europe was built.

Knowledge in Islam is a means to achieve noble aims to man's best benefit in the light of the teachings of the Holy Quran. It helps man to lead a happy and fruitful life.

“The Role of the Mosque in the Life of the Moslems”

Translate the following passage into Arabic?

Fasting in Islam is not just keeping away from food and drink. There is a moral discipline underlying fasting. It is the training ground where man is taught the greatest moral lesson of his life-the lesson that he should be prepared to suffer the greatest self control and undergo the hardest trial rather than indulge in that which is not permitted to him. That lesson is repeated from day to day for a whole month, and just as physical exercise strengthens man physically, moral exercise through fasting strengthens the moral side of his life. The idea that everything unlawful must be avoided and that evil must be hated is thus developed through fasting. Another side of the moral development of man by this means is that he is thus taught to conquer his physical desires. He takes his food at regular times and that is no doubt a desirable rule of life, but fasting for one month in the year teaches him the higher lesson that, instead of being the slave of his desires, he should be their master, being able to change the course of his life, if he so wills it.

Language

The gift of speech is a characteristic of every group of human beings. No tribe has ever been found which is without language and all statements to the contrary may be dismissed as mere folklore. There seems to be no warrant whatever for the statement which is sometimes made that there are certain people whose vocabulary is so limited that they can not get on without the supplementary use of gestures so that intelligible communication between members of such a group becomes impossible in the dark. The truth of the matter is that language is an essentially perfect means of expression and communication among every known people. Of all aspects of culture, it is a fair guess that language was the first to receive a highly developed form and that its essential perfection is a prerequisite to the development of culture as a whole.

One of the difficulties about the study of language, however, is that it is so universal and seems so natural that most of us never bother to think much about it. We take it for granted that every normal human being can talk, just as we take it for granted that every normal human being can eat, sleep, or walk. Phenomena can be so familiar that we really do not see them at all. People living at the seashore grow so accustomed to the murmur of the waves that they never hear it.

The Present Perfect Tense

The present perfect tense is formed from the present tense of verb “to have” (has, have) and the past participle of the principal verbs.

e. g.

I have written my homework

He has studied his lesson

They have been to Cairo.

This tense has several uses:

1-It may have a present meaning.

e.g. Summer has gone . = Winter is coming

He has lost his money. = He is poor now.

2- It makes a bridge between the past time and the present time.

e. g. I have been here for six weeks.

I have not seen him since last month.

I have not seen him since he left away.

3-It describes recent events, often with the help of the word “just” or “recently”.

e. g. The bell has just rung.

I have seen him quite recently.

4-This tense is used with: since, ever, never, already, just, and recently.

5-It is also used to show that a past action has a present effect.

e. g. The servant has cleaned the room. (It is now clean)

Many schools have been built. (They exist now)

Exercises:

Change the verbs between brackets to the present perfect tense;

1-We (miss) her a great deal recently.

Write a paragraph on : “The Person Who Has the Most Effect on Your Life”

 Translate the following Passage into Arabic:

The effects of anxiety on success, either in school work or in adult life , represent a very complex problem. As far as school children are concerned, evidence shows that intelligent children are a little bit less anxious than unintelligent children. It is a matter of common experience that if some trouble makes one anxious, one does not concentrate on one’s work in the same way as when one feels relaxed and safe.

When we come to university education evidence shows that the opposite is true. Evidence shows that students who do well in their final examinations are more anxious than those who do badly. University students as a whole are more anxious than other people of the same age. This is due to the stress of university life.

The Islamic Economic System

The Islamic economic system has important characteristics. It strikes a balance between the good of the individual and that of the society. This is reached through a wide range of means that includes: (a) the adoption of guided freedom of work where individual rights are subject to the fulfillment of public interests; (b) the establishment of a public property sector where individuals cannot afford to invest; and (c) the education and socialization of individuals in such a manner that they may pay equal attention to their own good and to that of the community.

Moderation is the key-word in Islamic economy to strike a balance between the interests of both the individual and the community and to avoid any clash between them.

In Islam, economy is inter-linked with the entire array of systems and situations be they religious, social, or political. These systems and institutions are integrated with a view to offer comprehensive solutions to any problem. Therefore, studying any one of them cannot be proper unless the totality of the array of system is taken into account.

The Islamic economic system is inter-linked with Islamic creed. It seems from the doctrine that Almighty Allah is the ultimate owner of the universe. The command and the affair is wholly His. Almighty Allah says, "To Allah doth belong the dominion of the heavens and the earth, and all that is there in."

The Islamic economic system tackles the problem of unlimited needs and scarce resources by restraining material needs and desires and subjecting them to spiritual scruples. It manages resources in a manner that is acceptable to Almighty Allah, Who is the Owner of the Worlds. Resources have to be made use of by the entire mankind. Man, as vicegerent of Almighty Allah on earth, should satisfy his good and pure needs.

(a) Write a Paragraph on “ The role of Money in Our Life”

(b) Translate the following Passage into Arabic:

While modern European Renaissance was founded on the basis of the accumulation of capital usurped from overseas colonies, the cruel exploitation of manpower, or the accumulation of capital usurped from the wealthy aristocracy, Islam ordains a totally different course of action for the accumulation of capital. This comes through by convincing everybody to spend in the way of Allah and by levying Zakat as well as other forms of taxation on the well-to-do. Zakat purifies the soul of the Moslem, guards against one's subjugation to one's wealth and acts as an insurance against poverty, invalidity and other forms of inability that may inflict an individual or a society. Thus zakat plays a great role in enhancing social solidarity.

The Meaning of Gestures

Why do people in all parts of the world when they feel that they are powerless shrug their shoulders, at the same time when bending their elbows, showing the palms of their fingers, often throwing their heads a little on one side, raising their eyebrows and opening their mouths? None of the movements is of the least service. The explanation lies in the principle of unconscious antithesis, which here seems to come into play as in the case of a dog who, when feeling savage, puts himself in the attitude of attacking and appearing terrible to his enemy; but as soon as he feels affectionate throws his whole body into a directly opposite attitude though this is of no direct use to him. On the other hand a French scientist has suggested that shrugging the shoulders is not to be explained by the principle of antithesis, that is the natural gesture of one who receives a blow without resistance. I think however that the shrug of a schoolboy who is being threatened with a blow on the ear is distinct from the apologetic shrug. The action of shrinking from an unseen danger, as when a missile is coming towards one from behind and someone shouts a warning, is of the same nature as the protective shrug. The French scientist describes it as a gesture of tucking in the head and neck. A somewhat similar shrug is familiar as an expression of feeling cold. Here is a conscious repetition of the attitude instinctively assumed to economize the heat of the body. The French scientist also suggested that the open hands express defenselessness, as showing that the actor has no weapons.

The signs of affirmation and negation are expressions of our feelings; we give a nod of approval with a smile to our children, and shake our heads from side to side with a frown to them when we disapprove. With infants the first act of denial consists in refusing food. In accepting or taking food there is only a single movement forward, and a single nod implies an affirmation. On the other hand, in refusing food, children frequently move their heads from side to side, as we do in shaking our heads in negation. Moreover, in the case of refusal the mouth is often tightly closed so that this movement might likewise come to serve as a sign of negation.

Writing Activities:

- a) Write a Paragraph on “ The Benefits of Reading ”
- b) Translate the Following Passage into Arabic:

It is difficult for people to see the link between their own behavior and their own disease. For example, many hospitals sell cigarettes in their stores while doctors operate on lung cancer cases and see patients with heart disease in the same hospitals. Disease is no longer “out there” It is inside us. We are the cause of our disease. Today most of the leading causes of death are clearly due to the way we behave. Between ages fifteen and twenty- five in the United States three out of every four deaths are because of suicide, homicide, or accident. So the major source of disease is in the person, not “out there.” Because of this, what affects our behavior is very important.

Ways of Reading

It was formerly supposed that when reading, the eyes moved steadily along a line of print, bringing each letter in turn into clear vision, and that, the reader rapidly spelled out the words. But, if you watch a reader's eyes (as you can conveniently by the aid of a mirror laid flat on the table beside the reading matter), you will find that the eyes are moving not steadily, but by a series of little jumps. They shift from point to point. In a newspaper line, a good reader's eyes will make between three and six stops, or fixations. During the rapid jumps, he gets no clear view, but during each fixation he has a clear view of a couple of words. He glimpses the first word or two in a line, shifts a couple of words and takes a look there, shifts again and takes another look, and so on to near the end of the line, from which his eyes make a long jump backward to near the beginning of the next line. This behavior of the reader's eyes is examined most accurately by the aid of photography. Evidently, the eyes are responding to combinations of letters rather than to single letters.

The reaction time method proves that a short familiar word can be read as a whole. Single letters are read as quickly as possible, and the reaction time is about four-tenths of a second. Short words too, are read in four tenths of a second. Since it takes no more time to read a short word than a single letter, the word is certainly not read by spelling it out. It is seen and read as a whole. Even a long word, if familiar, is read as a whole. A child can learn to read words before he knows his letters.

The speed of silent reading is much too great to allow time for spelling out letters, or even for pronouncing the separate words. Easy reading goes at the rate of two and a half words per second in a rapid reader. Difficult material is read slowly because more time has to be allowed for comprehension.

What are the limiting factors in speed of reading and why does one person read so much more slowly than another? Speed of comprehension is probably the most important factor. Difficult material holds you back while easily grasped material lets you move ahead rapidly. Comprehension depends on the reader's mental quickness and on his knowledge of the subject. But, is the slow reader necessarily slow in comprehension and forever doomed to be a slow reader? Not at all. He may not realize that his reading is slow, or he may even prefer to read slowly so as to savor each phrase to the full. Still, he is missing something if he has not developed the skill to read rapidly. Some reading matter that is not worth a lot of time may be read rapidly for pure enjoyment or for seeking ideas. It is one thing to finish an exciting story in an hour or two, and quite another thing to let it keep you up all night.

“Ways to Help students Improve their Reading”

b) Translate the following passage into Arabic:

Learning is linked with remembering, because if one does not remember what happened in his previous experience, he will not be able to learn more. One test of remembering is to try to recall the content of a college course. Some studies have shown that at the end of a college course , students recall 70% of the material, but after one year, they recall 24% of the material, and after the second year they recall 19% of the material. Another way of remembering is to recollect events and the circumstances surrounding them, as when you recollect the first time you went to school, the date of your graduation from college, the first salary you had from your job, or the date of your marriage. Thus collection reminds you of a personal experience that occurred to you in the past.
